Why do We Celebrate Labor Day?

Labor Day observances started at the end of the 19th century. At the time, the average employee worked 12-hour days for seven days a week just to earn enough to pay the bills and put food on the table. Many laborers suffered through unsafe working conditions, minimal access to fresh air, and poor sanitary facilities. Breaks or lunch hours were rare, and children as young as 5 or 6 might have worked in factories, mills, or mines. In response, trade unions and activists called for more rights for workers, including higher wages, better working conditions, and more time off. They held rallies and strikes to protest excessive work hours and poor pay. On September 5, 1882, some 10,000 workers in New York City marched from City Hall to Union Square in what became known as the first Labor Day parade. After several years of strikes and rallies, Congress made Labor Day a national holiday in Washington, D.C. President Grover Cleveland signed the bill into law on June 28, 1894. Labor Day has been a federal holiday ever since. Today, Labor Day reminds employers and employees of the contributions and achievements of the American worker.
